Seven Oaks Dam testing postponed due to storms

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has postponed the testing of the Seven Oaks Dam that had been scheduled for Wednesday and Thursday, February 23 and 24.

The corps, working with flood control agencies from San Bernardino, Riverside, and Orange counties, will announce new dates for the testing after studying the effects of the current storm on the Prado Dam basin and other downstream facilities, and gauging the possibility of additional storms next week.

The news media viewing opportunities scheduled for Wednesday and Thursday have also been postponed until the new test dates are announced.

Small amounts of water – up to 150 cubic feet per second – will continue to be released from Seven Oaks Dam until the larger releases of up to 6,134 cubic feet per second are scheduled and conducted.
