When you consider that grocery stores are open, casinos are open, and there are uncontrolled protests/riots (where no distancing nor masks are apparently required), I would think that it would be a fairly easy challenge to find numerous polling locations for something as essential as the ability to vote. It should be a simple matter of a spaced out line of people, who are allowed into a building (such as a school-- none of which are being used for students now). With the unemployment rate in CA right now at around 13%, there are probably many younger people temporarily out of work who could use the $100/day (instead of relying on mostly older, retired help who might have more health concerns). Coronavirus is not a valid excuse to limit or cut back on voting locations. Thank you, Gifford

P.S. my wife has sent in an application to be a poll worker and I'm sure you'll get others
